Marshall McLuhan famously stated, “The medium is the message.” McLuhan was primarily talking about how TV was taking over from the printing press in shaping reality post-WWII.

Today, it’s the digital realm shaping reality and behaviour and while the West is adrift in a sea of distraction with no rudder or navigation instruments… The Asian Sphere (led by China) is handling it well – implementing far-reaching plans.

John is the best expert I (Tain) know on how the Chinese think. And since Chinese thinking is going to continue to gain influence just about everywhere in the (developing) world…

You might want to check out his upcoming talk on Wednesday, October 11th, at 3 pm Eastern.

John has connections to some high-level Chinese families and government officials, some personally. He's also a member of the geostrategic advisory organization Exogenous, Inc (EXO), a private, for-profit version of the Pentagon's Office of Net Assessment. This private think tank specializes in understanding how the digital revolution is altering the way people see reality.

John's presentation will cover:

How and why the deterioration of the West-dominant "modern world" is an indication of the growing presence of a "Digital civilization."
Why Eastern civilizations (China and India) were never "modern" in a Western sense – and how digital tech is driving those cultures to "remember" their historic identities.
The difficult birthing of a new world order will be based on new sciences – and must reconcile the spiritual/energetic with the secular/material.
I've known John and kept in touch with him regularly since 1994. No other big-picture thinker on China has impressed me more. This should be a fascinating, value-packed presentation and discussion.

Expect to leave with a clearer picture of what is really happening in China and how the Asian Sphere is preparing to influence the world in the remainder of the 2020s and beyond.
